

The Battle Of Dresden

26-27 August, 1813

Scenario by Sam Mustafa, map by Chuck Hamack

In the autumn of 1813 the beautiful city of Dresden, capital of Saxony, was Napoleon's center of communication and supply, the hub of his position in Germany and the point on which all his maneuvers would turn. The battle there shortly after the passing of the summer armistice represents Napoleon's only major victory in the crucial autumn campaign, which saw the French forever expelled from Germany.

As a young man Napoleon Bonaparte had changed warfare with his lightning-fast movements, made possible by living off the land and focusing everything on fixing and destroying the enemy army. Thus he had turned upside-down the old principles of slow, methodical movements by armies concerned with their bases and lines of communication. Now, with a decade of aggression having brought most of Europe against him, Napoleon seemed to have forgotten his own revolution. His army of 1813 was massive, but it was a blunt instrument, a conscript horde no better than its enemies and in some cases (such as cavalry) clearly worse. And its commander was now very much fixated upon bases and cities which would limit the scope of his activities. While he pondered an offensive course to deal with the three (soon to be four) elusive allied forces building at the periphery of his positions, he dared not strike too far from Dresden.

Thus Napoleon entrusted the peripheral movements to subordinates, and rushed back to Dresden when he learned that the main allied "Army of Bohemia" was advancing north to threaten his base.

For the 1813 campaign the allies had dispensed with the notion of national armies. Rather, each main allied force contained major contingents from at least two allied nations. The Army of Bohemia, with its role as the "main" allied field army, thus fielded many of the best regiments of Austria, Russia, and Prussia, including the prestigious Guard formations. For that reason it was as much a political instrument as a military one, and the allied sovereigns were duly in attendance upon Prince Schwarzenberg, the army's nominal commander. Schwarzenberg was a competent and intelligent officer, albeit a habitually cautious one. His position was made virtually impossible, though, by the unwelcome trio of monarchs and their toadies.

The allies arrived at Dresden a full day ahead of Napoleon's returning army. That is not to say that the French were unaware of their approach. The city's garrison comprised the reinforced XIV corps of Gouvion St. Cyr, who had frantically fortified the southern approaches and outlying strongpoints. St. Cyr, the real hero of this battle, conducted a show of strength and activity that far exceeded his small force; at one point he had only a single man for every ten feet of fortifications. The allied army was mostly deployed by the morning of 25 August, and they ringed St. Cyr's position with a numerical superiority better than 6:1. Still they waited, bringing up the rest of the army and giving the French vital time.

The allied attack against the city began on the morning of 26 August. It was poorly coordinated and excessively cautious. By midday St. Cyr's outposts had been pushed in at all points, but the first elements of the Grande Armée were now arriving on the scene. Schwarzenberg's instinct was to withdraw, in accordance with the general allied agreement that no army should confront Napoleon directly. He was overruled by the sovereigns, however, particularly the vengeful King Frederick William III of Prussia. Thus the allied attacks continued, right to the outer houses of Dresden, until French counterattacks began to halt and throw them back. By nightfall the allied armies had been driven back to their starting positions.

That evening a heavy rain began to fall, the noise and darkness of which concealed from the allies the tens of thousands of boots, hooves, and wagons crossing the bridge into Dresden on the French side. The allied sovereigns again resisted the call to withdraw, and thus 27 August dawned muddy and wet as Napoleon prepared his counterstroke.

The opening French attacks on the left made little headway but the allied counterattacks were equally ineffective. With muskets fouled and footing unsure, infantry were particularly vulnerable to artillery and cavalry. Now the substantial allied advantage in infantry was negated as Latour's cavalry broke through, pushing the allied left away from the center, and capturing nearly ten thousand surrounded Austrian infantry.

The allied left had been decisively defeated but the real fear at Schwarzenberg's headquarters was caused by the presence of Vandamme's I Corps pressing far to the south, along their line of retreat. Thus the Army of Bohemia began to withdraw in the early evening and a jubilant Napoleon let them go without an effective pursuit. (He sent off fifteen captured colors to Paris and was surprised to learn that his Austrian wife was upset to see them!) Within a few days his victory would be overshadowed by a trio of serious defeats at Gross Beeren, the Katzbach, and Kulm.

Notes on the Orders of Battle at Dresden:

The battle of Dresden came soon after the Armistice, and as a result many of the units on both sides had been considerably reinforced. There were French battalions with over 850 men, and regiments with four or even five battalions. Nearly all the French infantry divisions now had two divisional artillery batteries, and the corps reserve artillery had been strengthened, too. Even the cavalry, so anemic in the spring, was nearly back up to strength. On the other side of the field, this was the first battle of the campaign for the Austrian army, and many of their regiments were likewise very well-staffed. (For example, the two battalions of the Austrian 11th infantry regiment "Erzherzog Rainer" totalled just over 2,200 men.) As a result, the units in this game tend to have higher SP values than in the other Grande Armée scenarios.

The French army of the Autumn campaign varied widely in quality. There were some veteran regiments from Spain, as well as some of the Spring conscripts who had finally completed their training and were shaping up into good units. But there was also a continuous flux of new recruits (120,000 had been sent forward since May), many with only the most rudimentary preparation. In Marmont's VI Corps, for example, there were a number of "Marine" regiments, some of which were fine formations of disciplined soldiers, and others were simply the scrapings of extra manpower from the Navy, who had never fired a musket before. In the Young Guard, the original regiments were fine outfits, but Napoleon had expanded the Guard so much in 1813 that the newer Young Guard regiments were no better than the line troops. The later Voltigeur and Tirailleur regiments had as little as ten days' basic training, and were described by Caffarelli (one of Napoleon's ADCs) as "the weakest and most sickly" conscripts he had ever seen. Apparently they hadn't even completed battalion-level training, much less brigade or divisional maneuvers.

The Allies were in a similar situation. The Russians, who had been in continuous action since the summer of 1812, were ground down and weary, and many of their battalions were at half strength or less (although the Russians sent to join the Army of Bohemia were in better shape than most.) The Prussian army was a weird mix of excellent infantry regiments and masses of Landwehr, no better trained and certainly less well equipped than their French counterparts. The Prussian cavalry and artillery were shrunken, mainly from a shortage of money and equipment. The Austrian army of 1813 was not the same weapon it had been in 1809. Never particularly vigorous, the Austrian officer corps in 1813 was acutely aware that they were leading "Austria's last army," as Metternich had warned, and they were doing their best to avoid undue risk.

The Scenario:

The weather is Overcast and variable, although players should treat any improvement of the weather above Overcast as a "No Change" result. The weather will either be Overcast or Raining — only these two conditions are possible on both days.

The ground is Soft.

All towns and all sections of Dresden are hard cover. The Elbe river is unfordable. All streams are considered obstacles. French emplacements are hard cover.

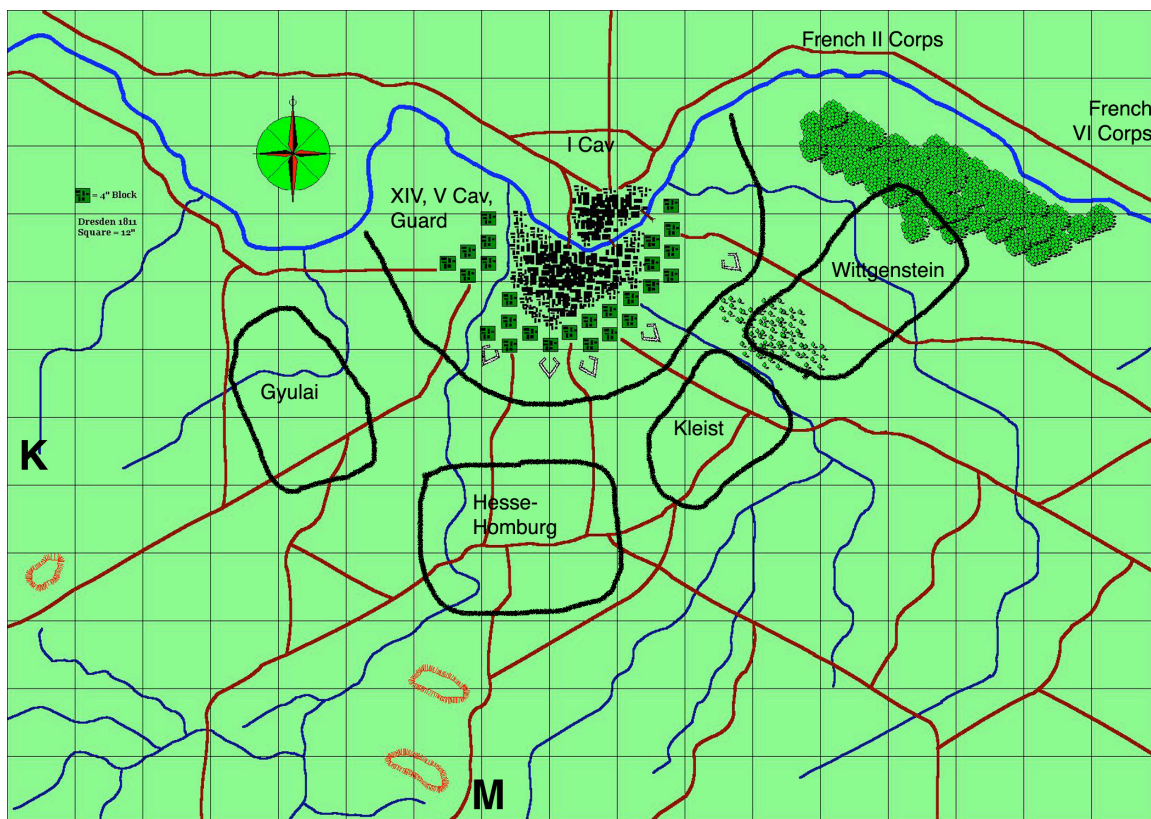

The Allies set up first, then the French.

The Allied army is "Fair." Its Break Point is: 25.

The French army is "Confident." Its Break Point is: 25.

Dresden Map by Chuck Hamack

The Scenario, continued:

The French must retain control of the city of Dresden and its crucial depots and above all, the river crossing. Therefore, each section of Dresden is worth 1 army morale for the French (only.) If an Allied unit occupies it, the French army loses one morale point. If the French recover it, they also recover that morale point. Control and army morale can thus flow up and down, if the city of Dresden changes hands several times.

Moreover, if night falls with allied units in control of the city section just to the south of the main Elbe bridge, then French army morale collapses, and the battle ends in an Allied victory.

Reinforcements and the Two-Day Battle:

This is a large battle, and it will likely produce a two-day struggle. The game begins on Turn 3 of 26 August. The Basic Length of each day is 7 Turns.

Allied Reinforcements (26 August):

In the first pulse of Turn 5, the allied player may enter Klenau's Force at board-edge point K. In the first pulse of Turn 6, he may enter Mildoravitch's Force at board-edge point M. Adjust the allied number of Forces and the break-point accordingly.

French Deployment (26 August):

At Start: XIV Corps, V Cav, and Guard: in and around Dresden, south of the river, within the perimeter shown on the map, I Cav in Dresden north of the river.

On the road: II and VI Corps

Alternative Dresdens, Play-Balancing, and What-Ifs:

1. The Weather

Bad weather prevailed throughout the battle. Napoleon was able to adjust his tactics to these conditions while the allies were not. As an option, start the game with a different weather condition, or Overcast with no variation.

2. “I’d Rather Fight a Coalition than be Part of One.”

Coalitions, by their very nature, have difficulty being decisive. Nonetheless, Schwarzenberg could surely have done a better job without a trio of royal meddlers talking at him simultaneously. For this option, assume that the monarchs are safely out of harm’s way. Increase Schwarzenberg’s rating to “Average.”

3. The Outlying Forces

Napoleon sent Vandamme’s I Corps, reinforced, on a wide flanking mission to cut the allied line of retreat. Vandamme crossed the upper Elbe at Königstein, but found his force blocked by the corps of Osterman-Tolstoy. These two fought a separate battle while the main struggle raged at Dresden. In the end, Osterman was able to keep the allied line of retreat open, and Vandamme was the one who became trapped when Napoleon’s lackluster pursuit left him exposed and cut off at Kulm.

This variant assumes that Napoleon brings Vandamme with him to the main battle. Players may alternatively add Osterman’s Force to the allied side, or bring both:
